Japan: The results of Prime Minister Sato's talks with President Nixon next week will set the tone for future US-Japanese relations.

25X1

Looking toward national elections as early as January, Sato appears apprehensive about the impact of US insistence that Japan offer clearly stated concessions on bilateral trade and investment issues. The Japanese also fear that the US congressional demand to pass judgment on an Okinawan agreement could trigger adverse political reactions in Japan.

Radical students in Japan are making a last-ditch effort to disrupt Sato's departure on Monday. The Japanese police have coped effectively with the students' recently developed hit-and-run tactics, but security authorities are concerned that a few extremists will use terrorist acts. The students feel they must make up for the failure of their violent demonstrations on International Anti-War Day last month.
